

THIS WEEK IN THE FLORIDA SENATE
FEBRUARY 26 – MARCH 3, 2018

Senate Advances the Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School Public Safety Act

This week, the Senate Committee on Rules and the Senate Committee on Appropriations both passed Senate Bill 7026, The Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School Public Safety Act, after hearing testimony and feedback from victims’ families, students, members of the Parkland community, and others. The bill then advanced to the Senate floor for additional questions, review, and discussion from Senators.

The legislation represents a comprehensive approach to addressing the issues presented by the horrible tragedy at Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School in Parkland, Florida, including firearm and school safety, and community mental health resources. Provisions in the bill will provide law enforcement, the courts, and schools with the necessary tools to enhance both public and school safety. Additionally, coordination between education and law enforcement entities at the state and local levels will be enhanced to help prevent a tragedy like this from ever happening again.

The Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School Public Safety Act will help to ensure that those suffering from mental illness do not have access to firearms, provide communities across the state with the resources needed to identify and treat those suffering from mental illness, and improve the safety and security of local schools. We will continue to work with our House colleagues during the final week of session to pass legislation that will keep our children safe in schools.
